When it comes to buying a motorcycle, most people do research and pick the one that's right for them. What make, size, color, price and accessories all factor into the decision on what you eventually buy. When buying insurance for your motorcycle, you should treat it just like an accessory for your bike.

You want to make sure it is what it says it is, and does what it says it does. You wouldn't buy new pipes that didn't fit or maybe didn't perform like you wanted just because they were the lowest priced ones you could find. And similarly you shouldn't get insurance only because it's the least expensive you can find.

Some things to think about or questions to ask when shopping around for motorcycle insurance include the following:

1) What type of coverage do you have for after market additions?

Some insurance companies have limits, or worse, no coverage for after market parts you've added to your bike.

2) What type of coverage is there for your riding gear?

If you had your jacket, helmet, or other riding gear with the bike when something happened, is there any coverage?

These are just a couple of questions to ask when shopping for insurance. If you do the research and you know what to look for when buying insurance, just like when you're buying your bike, you can make sure you have the one that's right for you.
