Yep, we're in the desert and the heat has settled upon us. My thermometer is when you look around and underwear becomes outerwear--summer has arrived! For some it is too hot to venture out on their bike but others take it in stride. On a recent ride I covertly led some of the riders into a conversation about how their day was going and what they thought of the ride. What a wide variety of responses came forth! Most riders were glad to be out for the day having fun and getting to meet new people. There was one particularly sour individual who didn't like the route, the pace of the group, the weather or anything else. Note to self--stay away from that Joe! My point is that you can place a group of individuals in the same situation and some will be happy regardless of the circumstances while others will focus on the negative and be vocal about their opinion. Where do you fall on the perspective scale? Why not focus on the good things and steer clear of whatever sends you into the mood dungeon. If you're reading this article chances are you're riding with the wind in your hair. Good news! You are on the road to happy trails--that's my perspective!

See ya on the Road...
